Perhaps I worry too much as a parent, not all together uncommon for those of us with CKS kittens. Dr. Mebalz, however, does console me with his belief that there is hope for the future.

"CKS is so prevalent we are not sure what exactly to do. Our early findings show symptoms seem to lessen after about 10 to 12 months for many CKS kittens," he said. "Of course, there are always relapses and flare-ups. In the meantime I recommend all family members get involved with support groups like KA Kittens Anonymous. Remember, the first step is always admit you are powerless."

Yes, so true. Powerless over a crazed and spastic kitten, I readily admit. For now, I'll learn to adapt and live with CKS. Time is on my side ... and wearing earmuffs on the couch isn't so bad.
