

On the Hunt

Provide toys that appeal to your cat's natural instincts.

By Erika Sorocco

Your cat would love to roam the world, chasing butterflies in the wide-open fields, frolicking with the birds in backyards and hunting rodents through alleyways. However, none of these places are safe for your feline. The best way to ensure the health and safety of our furry friends is by keeping them indoors, out of harm's way. To keep your cat's spirit alive, and assure that its hunting instincts stay intact, enlist the assistance of toys that will keep your cat entertained and satisfied for hours.

Get the December 2009 issue of CAT FANCY to read the full article.

Click here to read about the hunting postures of cats.